To have a creative spirit is to oversee it, even with the opportunity of falling flat. In such a case that you aren't willing to fall flat, you can't succeed either. Regardless of the scale, in the event that you don't have the drive, the need, or the spirit to be a director, the capacity to succeed will be low.

Yes, I was prepared enough, before going to shooting I work with my actors in the rehearsal room until they were completely ready with the scenes and dialogues and also prepared myself as a cameraman, director, and writer. Besides the climate, everything was on time in the timetable and went from script to screen easily. I feel like re-composing the scene and cleaning it more could have been great, yet as a beginning writer, I 'm not going to nail it 100% each scene I compose. But still, I am satisfied with my footages filmed with limited resources.

Indeed and yes. Having the capacity to impart the character and giving them a chance to place themselves into their shoes either by relative encounters or merely the characters' mindset worked superior to anything I anticipated.As I also told already that we spend more time in the rehearsal room before filming so no hiccups there.

Changing a line to be progressively normal, a few things look better on paper, however conceptualizing new things to state right now can be somewhat of a test. The actor I worked with was great at utilizing impromptu creation to enable the circumstance to arrive on its feet.

The smoothest part was working with the actors talking to them and telling them what I want just came naturally to me and also the shooting shots that were drafted early in a storyboard.

Regardless of how much ready you are, something will turn out badly. It rained practically 50% of the day and the climate was so foggy so making a one-shot going from inside to outside, playing with exposure, was particularly troublesome.

Lesson Learned: Always plan for climate conditions!

It is a moment that so many people can connect with. It's the moment the main character finds out the way to get out from drugs and addictions was into with the help of her father. I've seen lot's of people don't get a second chance in their life, but whoever has got that and utilized it they got success in it. So I put my central theme in that scene.

Indeed, I could not take a lot of control and let the actor be creatively free, and attempt takes with an alternate feeling, some of the time one way worked superior to other people. Having the capacity to impart my vision was clear and wasn't lost in interpretation ever. I believe I'm genuinely feeble in the part of creation. However, I have improved over the previous year.
